During a trip to China in June 2004, we had extensive contact with Chinese officials, think tank representatives, and cadres involved in ethnic autonomy issues. Our discussions focused on implementation of the existing body of law in China. Having visited China a number of times over the past 12 years, I heard a dramatically different message on this visit than previous visits. Chinese officials talked about the need to improve the countrys legal system, perfect arrangements for ethnic autonomy, adapt measures to local conditions, and conform laws and regulations on minority rights to international standards. I remember my first meetings with the United Fronts Bureau Number 2, the office that deals with ethnic Tibetan matters. Discussions were a one-way street. In contrast, there was genuine discourse and an exchange of views during our visit nine months ago. Recent developments are important to note. They provide political context for scholarly analysis as well as our discussions here today. Chinese officials affirmed that their contact with overseas Tibetans in Dharamsala proved that This method proves...
