Not illustrated. 1912 Excerpt: .School And Home Education a brief account was given of the work done last year with a class of overaged girls in the Newton Technical High School. At that time it was too early to speak positively as to the standing those girls would take in the regular courses in the High School. It has been gratifying to find that twenty-seven of these girls entered the regular courses of the High School and have secured a very satisfactory standing in their classes. Of these twenty-seven girls twenty are enrolled in the Commercial Department and seven in the Extra Technical Courses. Their work in the High School is being watched with interest by Superintendent Spaulding, who is a leader in the movement to educate all the boys and girls in the community, giving to each the peculiar treatment that the case requires; and then making the public schools, even through the High School, conserve all the youth of the city instead of the favored few only. A good many interesting facts have been discovered in studying the life history of these young girls, and it has been thought that it might be of interest to the readers of School And Home Education to report some of these. Jennie X, aged seventeen in September, 1910, was a girl of fairly good natural ability, but an indolent mother and a poor home filled with seven other children created an environment in which it was easier to slip back in...
