The reason is that personal property is not bound until the writ is lodged with the sheriff. Why does not the court follow out its principles in this instance, and apportion personal assets, rateably among judgments? It deviates as Lord Talbot says, from its ordinary rule of justice and equality, in allowing preferences against legal assets, in order to follow the law; and yet in this instance it deviates from the law, to establish inequality. The case of Mortice v. The Bank of England, may not, on an pt inVSr. accurate examination prove as strong upon this point, as it at F. C. 405. first appears. Perhaps the assets applied in the manner decreed were real assets, the produce of real estate. In the executrix's plea in 1731, she...
