Excerpt: . . . 11 Finally, a note about the regulatory competition. Gramm-Leach-Bliley was intended to seal the gaps of regulation by not only ensconcing functional regulation, but by establishing a primary regulator so accountability could not be ducked. It was also de-signed to make regulation more seamless and less competitive. On this issue, for instance, the Fed and the Treasury have shared au-thority so that the OCC, which regulates national banks and the Fed which regulates State banks as well as holding companies, apply together consensus judgment. From the real estate industry perspective, this was considered a significant plus. In conclusion, let me stress that the Gramm-Leach-Bliley Act was the product of many years of legislative debate. The final legis-lation was designed to ensure that the evolution of the financial services industry would not be impeded by protracted congressional interference. The process of defining new powers for banks and financial holding companies was by intent de-politicized under the act. In America, process is our most important product. It is process as much as outcome which Gramm-Leach-Bliley is about. In this case, the silence of the act on real estate brokerage activities makes it subject to review by regulators. This review, however, should not be one which assumes a congressional bias on result. There is nothing in the hearing record or report language which in-dicates the direction regulators should take, with the exception that any judgment of regulators would presumably have...
