The testing of paper by means of scientific methods has received an increasing amount of attention in the United States during the past 10 years. This has been brought about largely by the increase in the number of technically trained men in the industry and the desire of placing empirical and practical tests upon a more accurate basis. The purpose of this circular is to describe the methods of testing paper as used by the paper section of the Bureau of Standards and adopted as a result of testing a large number of samples of various kinds of paper during a period of years. These methods are those that are in common use in paper-testing laboratories and are given to fill a need expressed by laboratories and the general public. Proposed new methods and special tests are not included in this circular, but these will be published, separately as they are developed. The structure of paper is such that there is variation in some of its characteristics, even in a single sheet. It is therefore obvious that precaution must be taken to sample a lot of paper in such a way as to obtain a test sample representative of the whole lot. It is also necessary to make a sufficient number of tests in each case, in order that an average result may be obtained. It is important to obtain this average by testing 10 sheets of paper, rather than by making...
