We conclude this volume with some account o: a man who is still hard at work among us, striving to put the last stone on a noble edifice of philanthropic work upon which he has been engaged for twenty years, and for the sake of which he has indeed counted all things as loss. George Smith was born at Clayhills, Tunstall, Staffordshire, on the 16th of February 1831. William Smith, his father, was a hard-working, Godfearing man. The family was respectable--theirs was the nobility of labour, the long pedigree of toil. Several generations of Smiths had lived in a part of an antique farm-house named Canal Hall. From thence they had gone forth, year after year, from childhood to age, to make brick as aforetime. Such people used to accept this life-long, grinding labour patiently, stolidly--as a thing of course, a dispensation...
